A CRITICAL ANALYSIS OF POST-WAR PRACTICE AND THEORY

For Miller, the issue of the production/reception of a work of art is a genuine dialectic. He argues that the artist has no choice but to address socio-political questions and the ideological apparatuses linked to the production of cultural "artefacts." To (re)conceive these dimensions of art making Miller also confronts a broad theoretical corpus. From "polemical" pieces to extensive theoretical essays through studies on Ed Ruscha, Bruce Nauman, Richard Artschwager, and John Baldessari, the texts collected here respond to the ongoing collision of aesthetics and exchange value.

"Miller manages to combine a shrewd understanding of art-historical correlations with a daunting knowledge of popular culture ..." –Bruce Hainley, Artforum (Summer 2001)

"... Miller is an erudite and sophisticated analyst and reporter of the most complex post-war thought ... " –Liam Gillick, Art Monthly (September 2001)
