DESCRIPTION

The work of Xavier Veilhan (*1963) proposes an articulated balance between two and three dimensions, representation and interpretation, creating a fascinating back-and-forth between the objects and the people who occupy our real space and those which are merely images, floating in our reality.

For JRP|Editions' lithograph Marine (2025), Veilhan has worked from a three-dimensional scan made of someone close to him. The scan was first transcribed into a simplified volume sculpture, before being photographed to produce the image onto which the lithograph is transposed.

Playing between three-dimensional modeling and two-dimensional interpretation, the lithographic technique thus transforms the volume into flat fields of colors. This gives Marine the power of painting, combined with the reproducibility of printing and the depth of sculpture.
